

POWER OF PASSION

IN LEADERSHIP

CRAZY WINDOW

MEET HANS FINZEL

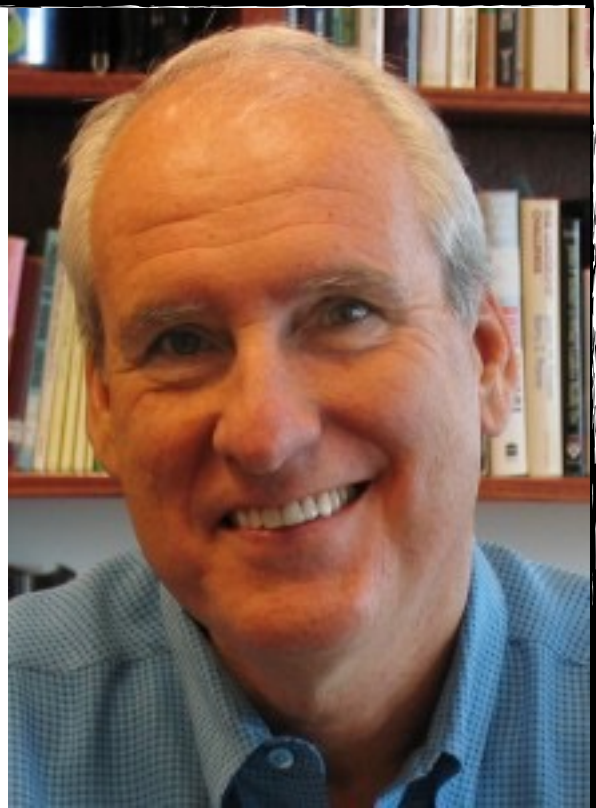

Dr. Hans Finzel is a successful author, speaker and trusted authority in the field of leadership.

He has trained leaders on five continents. For 20 years he led international non-profit WorldVenture, serving in over 65 countries. Hans speaks and writes on practical leadership principles from the real world—not the classroom.

He has written nine books, including his bestseller The Top Ten Mistakes Leaders Make. His books have been translated into over twenty foreign languages. Hans holds degrees from Columbia International University, Dallas Seminary and Fuller School of Intercultural Studies.

Hans Finzel has helped leaders take their leadership to the next level for over thirty years, he thinks the world of business has changed dramatically.

The biggest change is of course the technology revolution. When I was starting out, email was just beginning and the web was not really there yet.

Those who missed the tech revolution missed an amazing array of opportunities.

Here is a great quote I heard recently: A man is more afraid of the trouble he might have than he ever is of the trouble he's already got. He'll cling to the trouble he's used to before he'll risk a change.

Those who are afraid of taking a risk cannot survive in today's business climate.

To create new businesses today we have to innovate and embrace technology.

Qualities that helps to thrive through tough times

The number one attribute is resilience.

Number two would be persistence.

Resilience is different from persistence. It's not just different, it's actually more critical.

Persistence is the ability to stay in the game, to not quit, to hang in there. It's the attitude needed for the long haul, the recognition that success in whatever you're doing is not a hundred yard dash but a marathon.

Sometimes we have persistence but we lack resilience and you really need to have both; it's like two sides of a coin.

Resilience is about our capacity to bounce back from difficulties, disappointments, heartbreak and hard times. It's the ability to bounce back.

Resilience is absolutely critical in most endeavors; in leadership, in our lives.

Persistence keeps us in the race but resilience returns us to the right

Can an introvert become a good leader?

Absolutely! I am one great example.

Leadership is more about what you learn, than what you are born with. It is a misconception that all great leaders are huge extroverts with towering personalities.

I once met Mother Theresa in Calcutta, India. She was one of the quietest yet most powerful leaders I ever met.

Hans learned a lot about leadership during his twenty years as President and CEO of international non-profit WorldVenture.

You develop the skills of leadership by studying leadership, asking for feedback on your leadership and developing a spirit of humility about yourself.

If you are a leader, keep improving your game just like a surgeon keeps studying their craft.

I always say that the "L" in leader stands for two of the most important works ever leader must master: Listen and Learn!

People love to follow humble leaders that are willing to listen and learn. That does not mean they are weak...just that they are real!

The Power of Passion in Leadership

More on - Dr. Finzel's latest book

People love to follow leaders that lead from their hearts, not just their heads.

In my career of leadership I have had seasons of great passion as well as seasons of burnout. I've had great mountaintops and deep dark valleys. I think that's a normal part of the ebb and flow of leadership.

As a young leader I remember people flocking to hear me speak, hanging on every word and sensing the contagious energy of my vision. I felt a bit like the Pied Piper drawing everyone around me to join my gang but I can also tell you about the days when I lost my passion and kept trying to lead with my head instead of my heart.

His books have been translated into over twenty foreign language editions.

I knew it and they knew it.
Sometimes followers cannot leave leaders, because their jobs are at stake.

When who we are lines up with the role we are in, then we are in a place of passion. The less overlap, the less possibility of a fulfilling role in leadership.

And the thing is, we change, as we grow older, in relation to who we are.
The more these two circles overlap, the better. I wrote this book because I have a passion to help people get to a place where they do what they love,
and love what they do.

Readers, get ready to follow your passion

It takes courage to follow your passion.

Read my little book on the "Power of Passion in Leadership", it gives great guidelines on how to find out where you are at in this passion journey.

Write down your answer to the lottery question:

1. What would you do if you had all the money you ever needed?
2. What fuels you and what drains you?

Move toward a career that inspires you and fuels you.

It seems like more people are afraid to follow their hearts than actually do. It is scary, it takes courage and sacrifice, and the unknowns shut down a lot of dreamers.

We get comfortable in familiar surroundings even if they are not ideal. Please take my advice and pursue your heart. Listen to what it is telling you.

Life really is too short to settle for less than all you are created to be and to do. Whether you stay in your current job or leave to find a new dream—take the plunge and get into your passion zone.
